Good Farming News

Brief description of small grain varieties recommended in Virginia:

Winter Oats

Arlington: A selection from the cross of Lee-Victoria x Fulwin. It is a tall-growing, stiff strawed, moderately early maturing, highly productive oats. It tillers vigorously and produces a considerable amount of growth for grazing. It has rather large spreading heads similiar to those of the Lee Variety, as well as large, plump, awnless kernals of good weight. The kernals are reddish yellow in color. Arlington has slightly less winterhardiness than Lee. It is resistant to the orange leaf rust (crown rust) of oats, but is susceptible to smut and Victorian blight. However, the Victoria blight has not been a problem in fall oats seeded at a normal seeding date. Arlington should not be seeded for pasture earlier than the normal seeding date because of possible damage from this disease.

Atlantic: From the same cross as Arlington, and very similiar to it in appearance and disease reaction. The kernals are more yellow than those of Arlington. Atlantic also is slightly more winter hardy than Arlington. It has not yielded as well as Arlington under conditions where winter killing wan not a problem.

Lee: This is an old variety which has given satisfactory performance in Virgina for many years. It was selected by the U. S. D. A. from the cross Winter Turf x Aurora. It is shorter in height than Arlington, Atlantic and Forkedeer, and is moderately stiff strawed. Lee produces a bright yellow kernal that is fairly plump. It is slightly less winter hardy than Forkedeer. Like Forkedeer, it is susceptible to crown rust and smut, but is resistant to Victoria blight.

Barley

Wong: Was developed from a cross made in China and the particular selection from which Wong was developed was brought to Cornell University in 1934 and was released by that state. It has a stiff straw and is moderately winter hardy. It is moderate in height and produces grain of slightly less than average bushel test weight. Wong is a semi-bearded variety, having short rough awns on only the central floret of each spikelet. Wong is resistant to mildew but is susceptible to leaf rust, loose smut and scald.

Kenbar: This variety was developed at the Kentucky Experiment Station. It is a selection from a composite cross involving many varieties. Kenbar is bearded and has rather short heads. The short heads are partly due to the spikelets being closer together and partly due to fewer kernals per head. The beards or awns of Kenbar are semi-rough, having fewer and less prominent barbs on the awns than Ky. No. 1 (a smooth-awned variety) in general the heads of Kenbar stand more erect in the field at ripening time than do those of Ky. No. 1. It is approximately a week earlier in maturity than Ky. No. 1, about five inches shorter, and stands much better. It has relatively good resistance to mildew and scald but is susceptible to leaf rust and loose smut. It is not as winter hardy as Ky. No. 1.

Hudson: A six-rowed, rough-awned stiff-strawed, winter hardy variety of barley developed at the Cornell University Agricultural Experiment Station. It is a selection from a cross of Michigan Winter x Wong. It is similiar to Wong in maturity date, straw stiffness, resistance to mildew and susceptibility to loose smut and leaf rust. Hudson is the only variety recommended in Virginia with high resistance to barley scale. Like most other bearded varieties, it has had a slightly higher bushel test than Wong. At most locations where tested in Virginia, it has outyielded Wong by several bushel per acre.

Wheat

Vahart: Selected from the original Redhart at the Virginia Station and released in 1945. Vahart is a smooth - headed, variety that is medium-tall, mid-season in maturity, white chaffed and moderately stiff-strawed. It is moderately resistant to mosaic and mildew, is resistant to some races of loose smut, but is susceptible to leaf rust and stem rust.

Thorne: A selection from a cross between Portage and Fulcaster released from the Ohio station in 1922. It is a smooth-headed, brown-chaffed wheat that is mid-seasonal, medium-tall and fairly stiff-strawed. It is fairly high yielding variety of good soft wheat quality, but is somewhat low in weight per bushel. It is resistant to mosaic and to some races of loose smut, but is highly susceptible to mildew, leaf rust and stem rust.

Seneca: A selection from the same cross as Thorne. It is very similiar to Thorne in all respects, but has a higher bushel test weight, a slightly higher yield, and a slighlty stiffer straw.

Leap: Originated from a single plant selection from a field of Mediterranean made by a son of L. S. Leap, of Virginia. First distributed by T. W. Wood & Sons. This is a smooth-headed, early, medium-tall to tall variety with yellowish white chaff. The heads are long and lax, and are inclined to nod. Leap is resistant to mosaic and loose smut, but is susceptible to leaf rust, stem rust, and mildew.

Nudel: A bearded, white chaffed variety that resulted form a head selected from a field of Fulcaster by the Deleware Experiment Station. It is very similiar to Fulcaster except in being more uniform and in giving higher yields. It is very similiar to Nittany and VPI 131, but has been slightly higher in yield and is resistant to the soil-borne mosaic to which they are susceptible. It is moderately susceptible to leaf rust and is susceptible to stem rust and powdery mildew.

Atlas 50: A selection from the cross of Frondoso x (Redhart3-Nell 28), released by the North Carolina Agricultural Experiment Station. This is a moderately early-maturing, medium-height, stiff-strawed, smooth-headed, white chaffed variety. It has resistance to mildew and moderate resistance to leaf rust but is susceptible to the soil-borne mosaic. It is characterized by a head that is slightly spreading toward the tip, giving it a square appearance. Atlas 50 s a semi-winter wheat, and because of its lack of winterhardiness, is recommended only in the Southern Piedmont and Eastern regions of Virginia.

Atlas 66: Very similiar to Atlas 50. However, has slightly more leaf rust resistance than Atlas 50, and slightly less mildew resistance.

THE FACTS ABOUT RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT

(Prepared by the Federal Civil Defense Administration)

When atomic or hydrogen bombs are exploded close to the ground, they suck up into the mushroom cloud millions of tons of atomized earth and other material. This material becomes highly radioactive.

Some of the radioactive particles will spill out in the immediate area of the explosion, but others may be carried by the upper winds for many miles. Sooner or later they settle to earth. This is called fallout.

Normal amounts of radiation are harmless. It is only when it is present in concentrated amounts, such as are created by the ground bursts of hydrogen or the larger atomic bombs, that radioactive fallout can cause serious injury or death to those who remain in the open without protective cover.

Your civil defense officials, in consultation with the Weather Bureau, will keep you posted on the direction of possible radioactive fallout, should an attack occur, and tell you what to do.

The best way to survive the hazards of radioactive fallout, or any other threat an enemy may use against us, is to be prepared— to know the facts— learn what to do now.
